The program's Community Voice goal is to educate community residents on behaviors that promote healthy birth outcomes. After being trained through a short series of classes taught by Community Voice Lay Health Educators, participants are asked to share this valuable information with family and friends, especially with those of child-bearing age. By doing so, many people in the community become more knowledgeable about healthy living and subsequently help reduce the number of black infant deaths. This also gives the graduates, known as Lay Health Advisors, the opportunity to refer to or invite others to participate in the experience and make a difference.
